The cardiologist in the era of COVID pandemic

摘要：

To be a doctor in the field of cardiovascular medicine, I shall be the doctor who holds the doctrine I ever vowed to. I cannot evade the mission given by being a doctor, which means I shall take care of all the lives regardless of its illness, being sick even caused by a contagious virus.

The world is ever-changing, and even more, it has been changed by invisible viruses from time to time. As a doctor, I should be lucky that I shall be ever-learning in my career, which actually is compulsory in my profession.

The future is coming, and I would be in it, if I am not aboard, even it may not be today. In the era of COVID pandemic, my career as a cardiologist could not stand alone without incorporating myself in the teamwork of our hospital. Without system-based practice, any individual could not survive the tsunami of the pandemic, even if I was the most gifted and talented in my sub-specialty. Being undisciplined and got infected, I should be out of service, and it also cost my health.

In face of the emerging threats posed by the viruses, seeming not be quenched in the near future, resuming the role as a doctor should be of priority while executing our sub-specialty.
